

Carol Soon, a Doctoral Candidate in the CNM Programme has just published her first book chapter titled “The Rise of e-Science in Asia: Dreams and Realities for Social Science Research. Case Studies of Singapore and South Korea”. This book chapter is part of a volume (edited by Nicholas Jankowski) which features renowned scholars active in social sciences and humanities from across the globe. When Carol was first approached by her collaborator in December 2007 to write the chapter, little was she aware that the project would open up windows of opportunities to working with international scholars as well as learning more about the growing field of e-research in social sciences and humanities. Interviewing government officials and social scientists in Asia who promote and harness the technologies of e-science in research and development work, Carol has gained much insight into the immense possibilities e-science has in store for social sciences in Singapore and South Korea.
